These old glaciated soils are well-known for their low content of plant food, because of the extensive leaching to which they have been subjected, and it is reasonable to suppose that their content of lime should also be low. Evidently these particular soils at some time accumulated lime, probably through the growth of shell-fish in ponds which may have located here and there, or it may be that because of insufficient drainage there was a very much smaller loss of lime than that ordinarily occurring in this loess soil. But whatever the reason, the condition of the subsurface soils and subsoils are not necessarily the same as that of the surface soil, as far as acidity is concerned, and may be the direct opposite.
