Excerpt: . . . and it should not be heaped up in masses or in encyclopaedic fashion (Ziller, Vorl. , p. 280). It is necessary that the material offered to a pupil should not overwhelm him; nor should it appear to him as a drop in a boundless sea; it must be offered in well rounded form (Nordhausen, G.) and dealt out one topic at a time. The single sections requiring a series of recitations should be reproduced by a summary before the transition to what follows. Such unities offer themselves freely, for example, a longer or shorter poem; the exploit of a hero in the Iliad, a single historical picture in the historian, etc. This requirement is self-evident, but it is by no means always observed in practice, least of all when it is most needed, in historical instruction. At any rate the Persian wars, the second Punic War, and the Thirty Years War, would be divided up into sections, the rest seldom. An example of sectioning a topic. The Spanish War as a unit in the larger unit of the second Punic War. I. War of the two Scipios, 218 to 212. a. The Spanish War in the narrower sense. The advance of the Romans to the Ebro. The land of the Ebro as a basis of operations won. 6. The Spanish Carthaginian War. The advance of the Romans to the south coast. c. Backward movement until the fall of the Scipios, 21:
